In this highlight, Jean-Pele Fomete speaks on... the ongoing quest for justice

- 00:00 Because the, the winding down of the ICTR should not equate to the end of the quest for justice and that's why we should pursue this project of making sure we get the acceptance of countries to try those other people.
- 00:17 Otherwise, what does it mean? It means an accused person with connections like Kabuga, with resources like Kabuga, can simply escape. He knows the tribunal is closing very soon. So with his friends he can make sure he hides and when the tribunal winds down, he's a free person, but is that what we want? Is that what the international community wants?
- 00:41 The message we're getting from member state is that that's not the message. That's why that there is this idea of establishing a very lean structure after the ICTR and ICTY closes, a very lean structure that should be in a position to reconvene if required to deal with high-level criminals like Mr. Kabuga.
